

CHAPTER V

CONCLUSION AND SUGGESTION

In this section, the researcher concluded this study from the background of this study to the discussion of the finding. Then, this study offered the suggestion in accordance with the significance of this study.

5.1 Conclusion

So far, the most common research of language borrowing is dominated by the sounds adaptations or linguistically called phonological. Phonologists have long held an interest in loanword adaptations, which is in the transformations that apply to words when they are borrowed into a foreign language. Therefore, the researcher found the other English borrowing process after observed the French loanwords in English and conducted this recent study.

The collected data have been analyzed and finally concluded that all the French verbs are dominated by the -er ending, and English may borrowed those words with their words class type but under the constraint of English grammatical system, because English did not adopt the -er ending to suit the English language system. Another case of the discussion showed that there are some French words end -er but still kept by English. In fact, those words are only noun class.

5.2 Suggestion

Finally, the researcher conducted this study not only to fulfill the requirement of the department, but also to give the references for the reader especially the English learners who are interested in linguistic borrowing field. This study can lead the next researcher to a wide range of English language development research, and also to find the new atmosphere of how interesting conducting this type of study. The suggestion to the next researcher is read a lot to make a good research, especially the research of linguistic history that resulted the linguistic borrowing. Because, as history of language is one of approach in learning language itself.
